The Parts Of A Computer

Parts of a computer

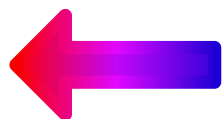

Do you know what's inside a computer? The main parts, or components, are a CPU (central processing unit), a GPU (graphics processing unit), a storage device, memory called RAM, and the mainboard that connects them all together. These days people use their smartphones more and more but computers are still irreplaceable for complicated projects and more in-depth work. Many of the parts that are found in computers are actually the very same parts that are found in modern smartphones. It's just that all the parts in our smartphones have been miniaturized and are much smaller!

Computers vs Smartphones

by Aidan

Many students use a computer or a smartphone for school and play. In the classroom, a large computer helps us learn new things quickly. We can search for useful information on the internet, watch educational videos, or type a school report. Smartphones are smaller, making it very easy to send a quick message to friends from anywhere. Both devices are important tools in our daily lives. However, using them for too long is bad for your eyes. It is always good to take a relaxing break, step away from the screen, look outside and let your eyes get some rest.

My Dad's Laptop

by Aidan

I have a computer at home. It is my dad's laptop. I use the laptop every day after school. I open the laptop and look at the screen. I can watch funny videos. I can play fun games with my friends. I do my English homework on it. Computers are useful tools! Sometimes, I use my phone more than my computer. But it is hard to do my homework on my phone. My dad's laptop is my favorite tool!

I love my laptop!

The Internet

The Internet connects us

Do you know what the internet is? It is a vast network that connects all computers, smartphones and smart devices together. It has completely transformed the way the world works and many people now rely on the internet to get through their daily lives. When I was young, we had to make frequent trips to the library to read books called encyclopedias and when we did want to use the internet it was an incredibly cumbersome and slow process using the phone line. But nowadays, all the information you could ever want is available instantly, at the touch of a button or the tap of a screen. It is an amazing resource and makes keeping up to date significantly easier than it was in the past. You can even easily keep in touch with your friends via instant messages, apps and phone calls using your smartphone. Unfortunately, it's not all good news. Regardless of the level of useful information that is easily available, there is also plenty of fake information and these days even digital fakes of photos and videos. Students need to be taught to responsibly use the internet to keep them safe.

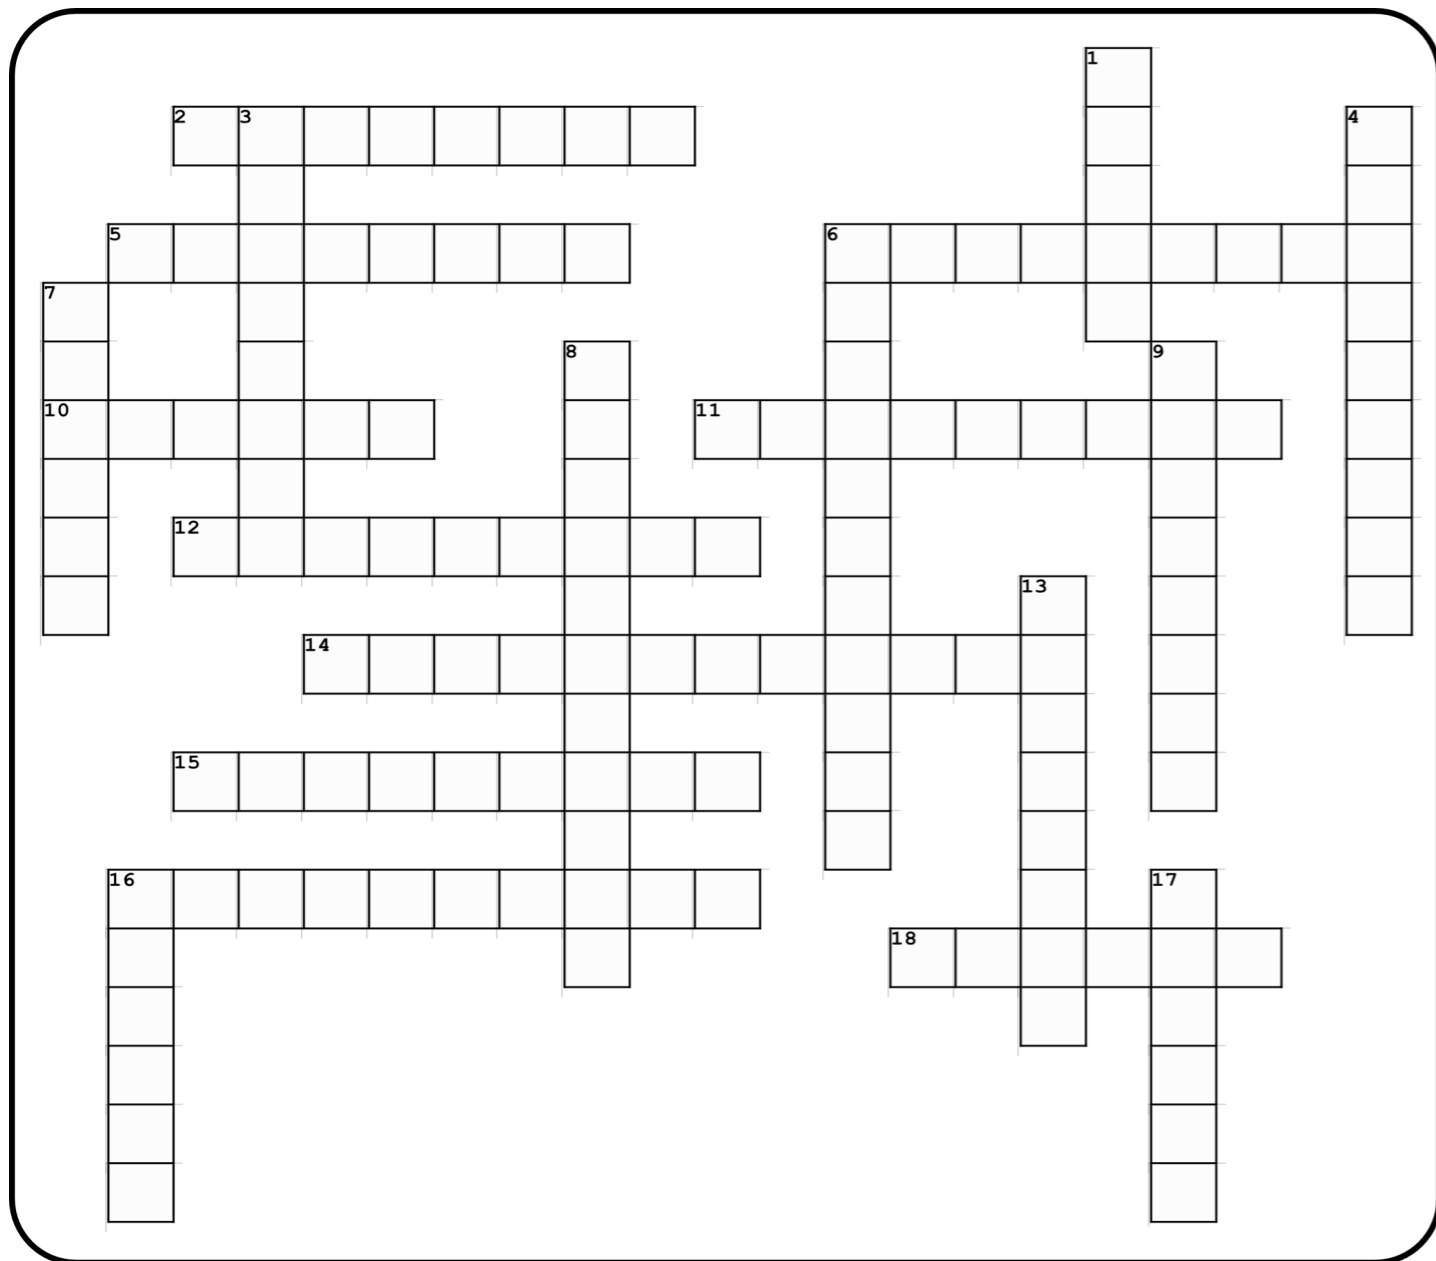

But use it carefully...

Computer Games vs Mobile Games

by Aidan

Do you prefer playing computer games or mobile games? These days, mobile games have exploded in popularity leading to a previously-unimaginable scenario where students often don't have computers at home at all. When I was younger, we all played games at arcades and all the children from the neighborhood would be there battling each other for the title of greatest gamer. We then progressed to being able to play arcade-equivalent, and eventually even better versions of these games on computers at home. These days, due to the advent of the internet, children often play multiplayer mobile games at home in the comfort of their own homes. But to my eyes, the quality of the games is incomparable. The graphics, storylines and the controls are vastly simplified on mobile games and we have been introduced to the horrors of microtransactions thanks to them. For an older gamer like me, computer games and rich experiences will always win. But which do you prefer?

My favorite boss is Sif from Dark Souls
